"I was taking a stroll in the woods, hedtating between a pig that belonged to a farmer a couple of miles away and a bee skip that I knew was full o' honey in an orchard about a mile in the other direction, when I got my eyes on a man who was limping along toward where I stood. I was in the scrub oaks, and he couldn't see me.

the neck in less time than it takes to tell it, and his wife don't know to this day, it hain't likely, why he never got back home. I took him to my dea, but found he was so old and thin that he was no good, and I had to throw him away. He had a big, flat bottle in his pocket, and I took it out and smelt of it. The stuff that was in it smelt elegant. I tasted of it and it tasted elegant. I swigged at it till I began to tumble around and yell like a painter. I remember kicking both o' my coung ones out o' doors, and that's all I reember till I came to and found myself tied H fast with ropes and a couple o' men standing by and looking happy. I was too sick to try and find out what was up. My head felt as big as four bear's heads ought to feel, and oh! the thirst I had in me. The upshot of the whole thing was that I wound up here, and so I ain't kicking. Have another pea-

"Hullo!" exclaimed the brown bear 250 "There's a woman and a baby, and another bag of candyl She's going to let the haby hand it in. I wish they'd make a mistake some time, and pass one o' them babies through! Then life would be worth living, and no mistake; wouldn't it? One o' then 1 babies 'd be almost as good as young pig!" "Sure!" said the black bear, throwing a gumdrop in his mouth. "Did you do much in pig and mutton where you came from, BEOWNY'S FOOD BEFORE CAPTURE. "No, not much," said the brown. "We had to depend on miners, and on hunters from the east. We had to hustle to get a miner, but the hunters came easy. I didn't think anything of going out and gathering in a hunter or two almost any day. But they weren't much rood. Too soft. Pshaw!
